The greater number of the lesions of the motor cortex are at the same time destructive and irritative. They destroy the nerve-cells and their processes in a particular centre and by their presence and advance stimulate those of adjacent centres into morbid or disordered activity. The clinical manifestation of a destructive lesion of a motor centre is loss of function--paralysis; that of an irritative lesion abnormal muscular contraction. Important differences in the paralysis or abnormal contraction are dependent upon the position of the lesion as regards the motor segments. These differences are due first to anatomical relations and second to secondary degenerations. The cortical motor centres are more or less widely separated from one another, and a circumscribed destructive lesion of the motor area may therefore give rise to a limited paralysis involving a limb or a group of muscles in a limb--cerebral monoplegia. As the axis-cylinder processes converge to form the pyramidal tract in the internal capsule, a lesion of limited extent causes paralysis of most of the muscles upon the opposite side of the body--hemiplegia. A lesion in the pyramidal tract as it descends, giving off fibres to the motor nuclei at various levels, causes paralysis of the muscles having their spinal centres below the seat of the lesion. It follows from the decussation of the pyramids that when the lesion is above the crossing the paralysis is upon the opposite side of the body, and when it is below it, upon...
